Third episode - The Neuilly affair.

It is a sad Cogolin and an anxious Juliette that we can see on their way to Gargan; but good news were awaiting them, Lulu was better, she slept. The so-called Mr. Bourgeois introduced Mrs. Stefan as being a Doctress from Paris to enable the Mother to remain near the child without fear of committing herself. It was decided that the little girl should be taken to the South to get back her health.

Meanwhile; at Neuilly, Binoclard dressed up in Cogolin's clothes presented himself to Mrs. Germinot, widow of independent means, the uniform of Receiver inspired the old lady with confidence, she opened her door which she had left kept ajar..... quarter of an hour later Binoclard came out, leaving the old lady lying on the floor strangled, carrying away her jewels and valuables and rejoined Mr. Lapusse who waited for him in a car there must have been a warm struggle for traces of it could be seen on the face and clothes of Binoclard. The uniform remained to be taken back to its owner, this would have to be done at night while the Cogolins would be out.

The party went off very successfully. There could be seen the rich Joaquim da Constabella. On an improvised stage, in the silence, Parisette danced the "Swan's death". Parisette?... No, it was Manoëla that the old Marquess could see. The sweet Manoëla as she appeared to him lying on her bed flowery cross.

While Senor Joaquim da Constabella looked back into the past, Mr. Stefan congratulated Parisette. His admiration was being manifested in too pressing a manner to please Cogolin, who arrived just in time to take the sweet dancer away. The Marquess came on the scene soon after and told his sad story and comparing Parisette with Manoëla's photo, which he always carried with him, showed the likeness which had so moved him. He named himself. At the name of Constabella Cogolin started up and enquired whether the Marquess was any relation to one + Antonio da Constabella who lived in France in 1902. - "He was my son said the old man, he was killed in the war" - "You can kiss Parisette" concluded Cogolin, and arrangements were made to meet on the morrow at the hotel Crillon to speak further on the matter and to elucidate this coincidence.

In the meantime Mr. Lapusse had but one thought- to bring back into his neighbour's room the borrowed uniform - the parcel was ready. Binoclard who had drowned his remorse in champagne wine was anything but sober, he, nevertheless, stepped over the window but lost his balance and fell in the void ...
